Mark Twain

Dr. Walter Bo

...in memory

Dr. Walter Bo was a fixture in the anatomy labs of Wake Forest University Medical School for over 40 years. He was notorious for his tough love tactics as a teacher - he frequently made students sweat with his infamous tap on the shoulder indicating it was time to be grilled about human anatomy. Those who were taught by the beloved Bo later would say that he was a pivotal part of their success as doctors.

Dr. Bo: 1922
Dr. Bo displays one of his anatomical models.

Dr. Bo, the graduate

When the class of 2010 were first years, Dr Bo was hospitalized right before an anatomy test. During lab, the phone rang. It was Dr Bo calling to wish us good luck on the test.

Janet Lin, '10

Dr. Bo, the teacher

Dr. Bo continued to share his love for anatomy even after he no longer officially taught the course. In the later years, he mesmerized students with his bare-handed manipulations of the cadavers and his ability to perplex even the most accomplished students.

Dr. Bo, the inspiration

Dr. Bo passed away in March 2009. His presence in the anatomy lab can never be replaced, but his legacy will live on in all the students whose lives he touched. He will be greatly missed.

Leadership Spotlight

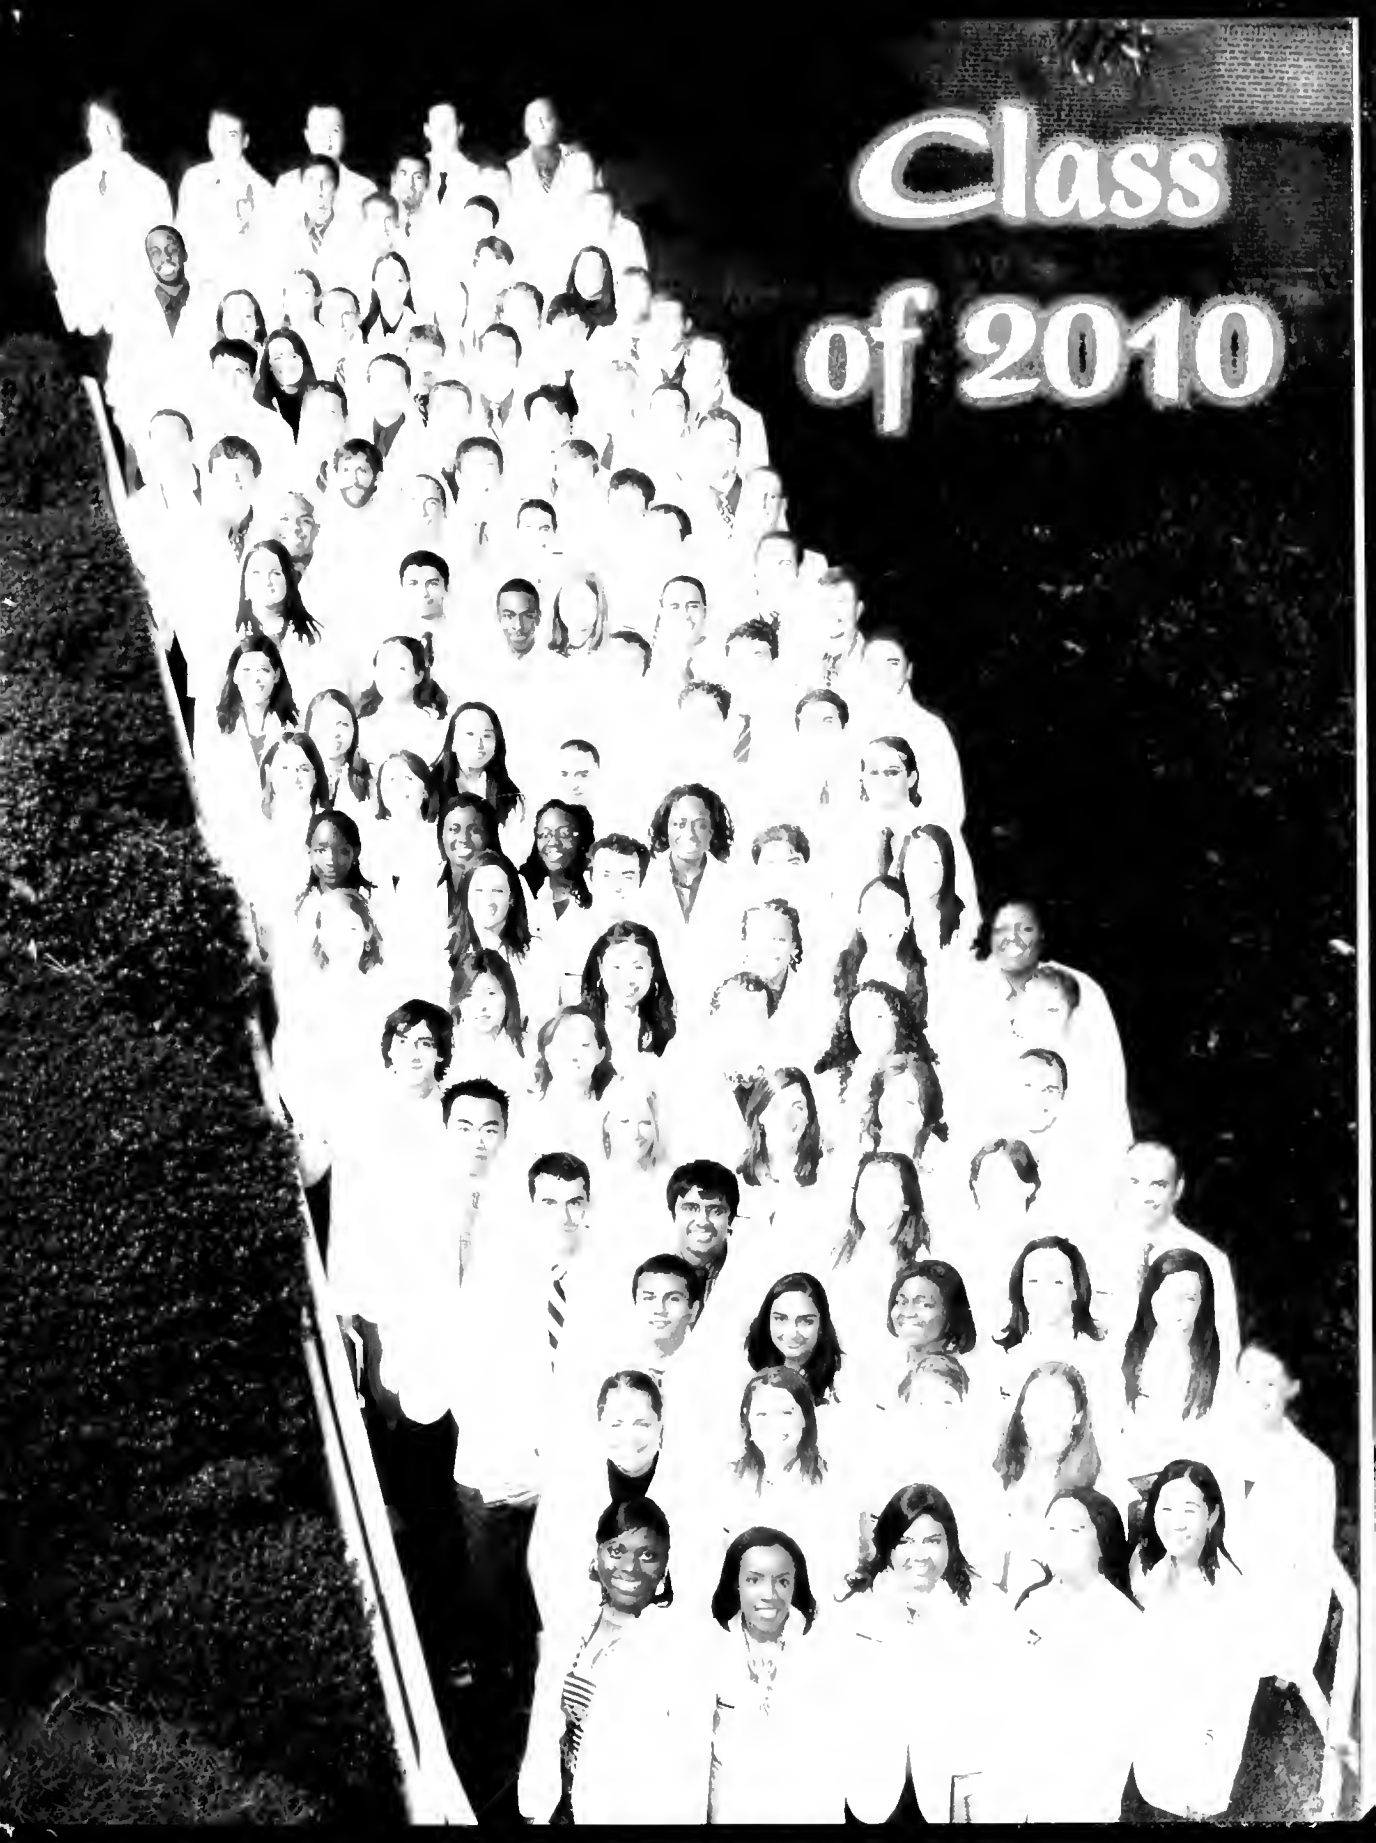

"I remember our first case, as we were making our differential, Dr. Bo suddenly said 'I remember when I had shingles.' It was a dead give away that we had come to a conclusion as the room filled with laughter. Dr. Bo wasn't concerned whether we had come to the correct diagnosis, but emphasized the 'care, compassion, and respect of the patients we treated.' This was essence of Dr. Bo."
